TRAGEDY OF A GOAT

Paul Crobach, Edgewater's village blacksmith, had two goats as fine as any along the Jersey Palisades. Mother and son, Nanny and Bill. were privileged characters in village, and doubtless thought they were entirely within their per-ogatives when they made a toothsome luncheon out of the fine new green and growing tomato plants set out so carefully and nursed so proudly by Michael Hawkins, who works in the Ellis Oil Works and lives not far from the spreading chestnut tree under which the village smithy stands. Mr. Hawkins thought otherwise, however, and when he came home from a hard day's work to wander among his tomato vines and found nothing Crobach's Nanny goat and her kid. puffed out like balloons with his tomato vines inside, it roiled his temper, and, it is charged by the blacksmith, he did things that were unneighborly, to say

It is charged that Mr. Hawkins went back to the oll works and got two cans of paint, such as is used there to paint il barrels for a protection of the barrels from the weather. At any rate, when Nan and Billy came home to the blacksmith shop in the dusk they looked Policy in the Transvaal Will like two green beer-kegs navigating on
